What it is

Our next project: a youth-run journal publishing health research by young people, with its own editor and youth peer reviewers, so young researchers get a genuine review process and a place to publish.

Why it matters

Most young people never see their work reviewed or published until university, if at all. A youth journal builds research skills, gives young people's findings a credible platform, and grows the evidence on what young people need from their health.

How it will work

- 1 Open call for submissions on youth health topics.
- 2 The editor checks fit and ethics, including consent and safe messaging.
- 3 Two youth peer reviewers give feedback. Where one is available, a volunteer research mentor may also advise.
- 4 The author revises, and the editor makes the final call.
- 5 Aletheia's director and executive team review every final version before it's published.
- 6 Published online, free to read, credited in full to the author.

Roles we'll be recruiting

ROLE	WHO	WHAT THEY DO
Editor	Aged 14 to 25	Manages submissions and makes the final call on each paper
Peer reviewer	Aged 14 to 25	Gives authors clear, constructive feedback
Research mentor	18 or over, with research experience	Advises on method and evidence where available. Mentor support is tentative, and not every paper will be reviewed by a mentor

Who it's for

Young researchers aged 14 to 25, and readers who want to hear young people's evidence first-hand.

Where it's at
